Christine Byers, Cultural Affairs Manager, introduced the item noting differences between Attachment 1 and the staff report; she clarified that the lobby doors leading to the artwork will be locked for security reasons; discussed visibility through the storefront windows; the degree of discernment of the pixelated effect from a distance; and the updated lighting plan after consideration by the Public Art Subcommittee.

Chair Fleischer invited public comment.

Christine Byers, Cultural Affairs Manager, indicated that no public comment had been received.

Phil Silver, Jacmar Properties, indicated that the art should be visible to pedestrians and anyone driving by.

Warren Brand, Branded Arts, provided background on his organization and a rendering of the artwork; discussed the artist selection process; the chosen artist; digital art; urban art; project location; public access and viewing; lighting; materials; maintenance; the plaque; the budget; and project installation.

Phil Silver, Jacmar Properties, discussed changes to the lighting plan to avoid shadows and to avoid physically blocking the artwork.

Discussion ensued between staff and Commissioners regarding secondary lighting; emergency lighting; lighting per code; clarification that the project met the requirements of the ordinance; concern that the artwork concept is not exciting; a suggestion to add more color and add space to the top of the image; clarification that the site is on Washington Boulevard rather than Washington Place; the artist's concept; lighting; glare; criteria for artwork submission; concern that the concept did not meet the following conditions per the CCMC: "Creation of a desirable environment for the general community by the design and location of the artwork", and "whether the artwork is representative of a broad variety of tastes within the community and makes a contribution to the provision of a balanced inventory of artworks commissioned through the APPP (Art in Public Places Program); whether it is acceptable to have George Washington supported by public art; and clarification that historical figures are not to be blamed for living in their time, but do not need to be actively promoted.

Additional discussion ensued between project representatives, staff, and Commissioners regarding whether it is appropriate to use a traditional depiction of a founding father; those who have concerns about the founding fathers; Culver City as sitting on the land of the Gabrielino/Tongva Indians; treatment of native Americans by George Washington; concern with people who may walk by the rendering and be unable to see the pixelation and also be uncomfortable with the Gilbert Stuart rendering; concern that based on the findings in the ordinance, the concept cannot be supported; important things George Washington tried to create; people acting within their times; the Civil War; the rendition of a famous portrait; pixelation; the feeling that art should lead to conversation; subjectivity of art; the distance of the artwork from the public right of way; size of the tiles; whether the pixelation effect would translate; and the definition of "freely accessible".

Further discussion ensued between staff and Commissioners regarding the way the city is represented and why it matters; the image of the city; whether the image of George Washington means something in Southern California; the artist being from another country and the perspective that may lend; the importance of experience in the place and understanding cultural context of where the art is going to go; putting personal taste and political views aside and determining whether the project meets the program's requirements; imposing personal concerns or judgements on others; concern with getting caught up in temporary and trending views; concern with slandering those who got the country to where it is today; concern with derailing the process; ensuring a diverse representation; concern with looking at the project through a biased lens; neutralization of the concerns since a Chilean artist chose the portrait; what constitutes slander; the Eurocentricity of the artist; laziness in the concept; the 75 different Washingtons listed in Wikipedia; the ordinance; addressing what the developer wants for their project site; the art consultant; the fact that the conquerors are the ones who write history; and what has been left out of history.

Additional discussion ensued between staff and Commissioners regarding the many things all over the country that commemorate George Washington; whether something new in celebration of George Washington is necessary; the feeling that condition no. 9 of the ordinance has not been met; the area of the city where the project is located; diversity of the city; the project as being unrepresentative of a broad variety of tastes in the area; support for the piece as private art, but not public art; concern with being representative of constituents in the city; concern that the piece is not exciting or forward thinking; adding another dimension to the art to make it more broadly acceptable; and whether the Commission can impose changes on the artwork concept.

Warren Brand, Branded Arts, discussed subtle effects in the background of the portrait; the pixelation; and the artist's style of pixelation.

Additional discussion ensued between staff and Commissioners regarding pixelation of a famous painting; seeing George Washington through a different lens; laziness of the concept; choosing what to do with the art based on the street name without understanding the cultural awareness; the responsibility of the art consultant to guide the artist; and parameters.

Responding to inquiry, Phil Silver, Jacmar Properties, discussed issuance of permits; the construction timeline; and he clarified that the mural would be one of the last items completed and would take 2-3 months.

Warren Brand, Branded Arts, discussed murals of school namesakes; direct portrait tributes; and iconography.

Further discussion ensued between staff and Commissioners regarding more subtle ways to pay tribute; the process in the event of a stalemate; the unexpected Commissioner absence; bringing the item back for further consideration; Commission purview; City Council consideration of an appeal; the ability to approve the item, approve with conditions, or deny; ensuring that the pixelated condition translates when viewed through the lobby windows; options for the developer if the art project is denied; the politically charged concept; agreement that there is sufficient time to revise the art concept; deaccession of other artworks approved on appeal to the City Council; underlying reasons for denial that come to fruition; the recent deaccession of After Market Wheel; the important conversations; sending developers back to create something stronger and better; time and money invested in the process; the experience of Branded Arts in working with the City; sentiments voiced at the Council level; public participation; and honoring the current time.

Responding to inquiry, Christine Byers, Cultural Affairs Manager, discussed the process for making an appeal to the City Council.
